Trump relaxes space rules, Musk to benefit

Agencies
WASHINGTON

US President Donald Trump signed an executive order on Wednesday to streamline federal regulation governing commercial rocket launches, a move that could benefit Elon Musk's SpaceX and other private space ventures.

Trump's order, among other things, directs the US transportation secretary to eliminate or expedite environmental review for launch licenses administered by the Federal Aviation Administration, the White House said in a statement.

The declaration also calls on the secretary to do away with "outdated, redundant or overly restrictive rules for launch and reentry vehicles." "Inefficient permitting processes discourage investment and innovation, limiting the ability of US companies to lead in global space markets," the executive order states.

While Musk and Trump had a high-profile falling out months ago, the billionaire entrepreneur's SpaceX rocket and satellite ventures potentially stands to be the single biggest immediate beneficiary of Trump's order on Wednesday.

SpaceX, though not mentioned by name in Trump's order, easily leads all US space industry entities, including NASA, in the sheer number of launches it routinely conducts for its own satellite network, the US space agency, the Pentagon, and other enterprises.

Jeff Bezos' private rocket company Blue Origin and its space tourism business could also gain from a more relaxed regulatory regime. Musk has repeatedly complained that environmental impact studies, post-flight mishap investigations and licensing reviews required by the FAA have needlessly slowed testing of SpaceX's Starship rocket, under development at the company's South Texas launch facility.

Starship is a centerpiece of NASA's ambitions for returning astronauts to the moon's surface, establishing a permanent human lunar presence and ultimately sending crewed missions to Mars.

Rain batters South Korea's capital; 1 dead

Torrential rain that battered South Korea's greater capital region for two days began easing Thursday afternoon, but not before claiming at least one life. The downpour in the greater Seoul area began early Wednesday morning, causing flooding, damaged hundreds of roads and homes and forced nearly 1,000 people to evacuate. The rain slowed Thursday afternoon and South Korea's weather agency forecast it will taper further later in the day.

Woman finds 2-carat rock at US park

A New York woman has unearthed a 2-carat white diamond at an Arkansas state park, a gem she says will be used in her engagement ring. Michere Cox of Manhattan spent several weeks at the state park in July after deciding to forage for a diamond, according to a news release from Waymon Cox, an assistant superintendent at Crater of Diamonds State Park. The 31-year-old woman searched for diamonds during much of July in a 37-acre field that is part of the eroded surface of an ancient volcanic crater.
